HISTORICAL NOTE

Arthur S. Meyers, a historian and librarian, did extensive research to create a detailed account of the Open Forum Movement in the United States for his book, Democracy in the Making: the Open Forum Movement (2012). The movement was founded by George W. Coleman, a lay Baptist leader and businessman in Boston, in 1908 with the creation of the Ford Hall Forum. Conceived as a form of popular education for adults, proponents of the movement, including Coleman and Mary Caroline Crawford, sought to create a space for public and democratic discourse between people from all walks of life. The lectures, which were free and open to the public, were locally administered and featured prominent speakers discussing current issues of the day. Features unique to the forums included their trans-denominational focus and a format that allowed equal time for the lectures and the question and answer periods.

Based on the success of the Ford Hall Forum, Coleman's model spread from Boston throughout the U.S. to cities like Detroit, DuBois, Hammond, and Terre Haute and attracted thousands of people. The lecture movement declined in popularity over time with the advent of radio, film and, later, television.

SCOPE AND CONTENT

During the course of his research, Meyers gathered photocopies of articles, advertisements and programs related to the Open Forum movement and correspondence of important proponents of the movement, including Coleman and Crawford. The history of the Ford Hall Forum is well represented in the collection. The materials collected range in date from 1885-2011.
