To the members of the Freshman Class:

The current generation of students is very hard to make decisions about. Many students today are so focused on their studies that they forget to take part in the full college experience. SUFFOLK JOURNAL

To meet this pattern as inevitable, is almost as logical as to predict that the sun will never rise tomorrow. Nothing from the past presuming that the depression of 20% may be laid at the door of the Republican administration.

REPUBLICAN DEPRESSIONS

The one thing when the Republican administration must avoid at any cost is a depression. If ever the Republican party was at trial of its administration, it is the United States of the United States, and the Republican administration has the scene, and it is to be fought with a stronger and more dangerous weapon than anything from the past (presuming that the depression of 20% may be laid at the door of the Republican administration).

DEMOCRATS ESCAPE

The Democratic party have seen the pattern, escaped it's consequences in the nick of time by going out of power in defeat. Patterns, however, can be altered and depressions can be avoided by a strong leader and a well planned campaign. Only the opposition party could accomplish this in the greatest satisfaction of the general sentiment.

It appears to the writer that the Republican administration has carried on the demonstrable programs of the previous administration and may even out-liberalize the "Democrats." At the same time it will make a strong leader, and only the party in opposition can perform with the thoroughness required.

PROF. ISRAEL STOLPER

THE SECOND METHOD

The second method of approach calls for the use of the broad generalization, leading to the discovery of such general observations as appear to be valid. On the basis of such observations we can try to determine the validity of the predictions. Here the problem of our choice or showing statistics, which I am not. A great care must be exercised to avoid the pitfalls which encumber the way. For here, lacking the detailed data, the measurement of patterns is not possible by observation.

The most authorities sound grave warnings to those who would measure public opinion. There are large numbers of horrid ex- ample to serve as deterrents. But here in this present instance, we do not have the data to work with which minimizes the degree of speculation.

OLD PREDICTIONS

First, we must deal with the predictions prevailing the election. The problem of the election is a very broad one. It is generally accepted that when before the nominations and campaigns a substantial proportion of all voters have committed themselves to one party or another as well as another and are not more likely to be beamed from their party than from church allegiance. And it is equally true that their fixed voting habits seemed to run in certain patterns which persisted in the election to come.

It is possible to predict these patterns with considerable accuracy. Big cities tend to vote Democratic and small towns Republican, and any one who attempts to predict their fixed voting habits as something inexplicable from election to election is likely for a great surprise or disappointment. The myth that big cities vote Democratic has certainly been exploded in the recent election results, as well as the uncharacteristic swing in the recent election of the New England states.

NEW TRENDS

Polls in droves shifted from Democratic party allegiance to Republican, and anyone who attempts to "predict their fixed voting habits as something inexplicable from election to election" is for a great surprise or disappointment. The myth that big cities vote Democratic has certainly been exploded in the recent election results, as well as the uncharacteristic swing in the recent election of the New England states.

Chesterfield. For six months a group of men and women
