Youth's Idealism Vs. Adult Reality

As the educational and social world of today unfolds, interior designers and educators face new problems of family comfort, society, and other related factors. Youth, teenagers, or parents, instead of being told to find solutions to the situations they face, may find themselves facing problems of their own. The situation may occur to them as being more complicated, more unpredictable, and more difficult. They are faced with problems that are more complex than they are accustomed to, and they may feel more uncertain about their ability to handle the problems. This may lead to a feeling of helplessness and fear. The solution may be to seek the advice of someone who is more experienced or who has handled similar situations before. This may include a parent, a teacher, a counselor, or a mentor. The goal is to provide guidance, support, and encouragement to help youth develop the skills and confidence they need to handle life's challenges.
