MANDAMUS AND RECUSAL: PROMOTING PUBLIC CONFIDENCE IN THE JUDICIAL PROCESS

Because courts control neither the purse nor the sword, their authority ultimately rests on public faith in those who don the robe.¹

I. INTRODUCTION

The judiciary occupies a unique place in the American system of government as an impartial, nonpartisan arbiter of justice.² The judiciary aspires to preserve both the reality and the appearance of its neutrality.³ Recent public debate examining the neutrality of Supreme Court Justices highlights the importance of promoting public confidence in the judiciary by preserving the appearance of impartiality.⁴ Most recently, Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia raised eyebrows when he joined Vice President Dick Cheney on an overnight duck-hunting trip on the Louisiana bayou. Critics questioned the trip’s propriety because two weeks earlier the Supreme Court had granted certiorari to review discovery orders mandating disclosure of documents produced by the National Energy Policy Development Group, an advisory committee chaired by Cheney. Empathically denying any impropriety, Scalia denied litigant Sierra Club’s motion requesting his recusal.

Constitutional due process guarantees litigants the right to a trial before a fair and objective judge. Judicial impartiality is of a constitutional nature, thereby requiring courts to guard against even the appearance of bias. The judiciary considers neutrality so fundamental to the integrity of the judicial process that the judicial code of ethics mandates impartiality.

7 See Cheney v. United States Dist. Court, 124 S. Ct. 1391, 1401 (2004) (concluding that Justice’s impartiality could not reasonably be questioned). In denying Sierra Club’s motion, Scalia emphasized the consequences of recusal at the Supreme Court level on the outcome of cases. See id. at 1394-95. Scalia also asserts that allowing the allegations of investigative journalists to dictate recusal decisions would severely undermine the presumption of judicial neutrality. See id. at 1402. In addition, Scalia noted that friendship between high-ranking officials of the executive and judicial branches is common throughout history. See id. at 1400-01.

9 See Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. Lavoie, 475 U.S. 813, 825 (1986) (disqualifying judge to protect due process rights and to guard against appearance of impropriety despite lack of actual bias).

10 See MODEL RULES OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT Canon 3(b)(5)(1999). The code states in pertinent part:

A judge shall perform judicial duties without bias or prejudice. A judge shall not, in the performance of judicial duties, by words or conduct manifest bias or prejudice, including but not limited to bias or prejudice based upon race, sex, religion, national origin, disability, age, sexual orientation or socioeconomic...
Recusal statutes provide one mechanism for ensuring judicial neutrality. Modern recusal statutes allow for the disqualification of judges during trial due to either actual or apparent bias. These statutes are principally concerned with fostering public faith in the administration of justice.

Petitions to appellate courts for writs of mandamus ordering reassignment during litigation of the case-in-chief or on remand offer litigants an alternative method of remedying judicial prejudice. Mandamus is not a writ of right, and is traditionally considered an extraordinary remedy. Appellate review of the denial of motions to recuse, whether or not via a writ of mandamus, challenges the relationship between the federal courts of appeals and the district courts.

This Note addresses the writ of mandamus as an instrument for protecting judicial impartiality and promoting public confidence in the judicial process. This Note also contemplates factors the federal courts of appeals consider when invoking their power to order cases reassigned by the district courts. Part II chronicles the history of supervisory and advisory mandamus; the evolution of recusal for bias; and, finally, the interrelationship of mandamus, recusal, and the final decision rule. Part III addresses the courts of appeals’ varying approaches to evaluating mandamus petitions requesting the reassignment of cases for alleged bias or prejudice. Part IV contemplates the broadening scope of supervisory mandamus and

See generally 12 JAMES WM. MOORE ET AL., MOORE’S FEDERAL PRACTICE § 63.61 (3d ed. 1999) (detailing procedural differences between §§ 144 and 455(a)). Section 144 requires the party asserting bias or prejudice to file an affidavit at least ten days prior to the beginning of the term at which the proceeding is to be heard, unless the party can show cause for failure to file a timely affidavit. See id. Section 455, however, does not impose a time limit upon the party filing a motion seeking the judge’s disqualification. See id. The moving party must file the motion as soon as it becomes aware of facts demonstrating partiality. See id.

the propriety of employing mandamus as an alternative to traditional methods of judicial disqualification.\textsuperscript{19} Part V concludes that a broad approach coupled with clear procedural rules would not only strengthen public faith in the judicial process, but would also maintain the presumption of judicial impartiality.

II. HISTORY

A. Evolution of Mandamus

The All Writs Act grants the federal courts of appeals the power to issue writs to the lower courts either mandating or prohibiting certain action.\textsuperscript{20} Traditionally, such writs issued only when an appellate court deemed lower court action a "usurpation of power."\textsuperscript{21} Such usurpation usually consisted of an exercise of jurisdiction amounting to a clear and indisputable impropriety.\textsuperscript{22} The Federal Rules of Appellate Procedure assert that mandamus will lie only upon a showing of an indisputable right to relief or in exceptional circumstances.\textsuperscript{23} In addition, the federal rules require petitioners to demonstrate not only a clear abuse of discretion or conduct amounting to a usurpation of judicial authority, but also the lack of alternative means for relief.\textsuperscript{24}

Despite these stringent requirements, however, the variety of situations in which the courts of appeals grant writs of mandamus has broad-

\textsuperscript{20} See 28 U.S.C. § 1651 (2002) (granting all courts created by Congress power to issue all writs necessary and appropriate in aid of their jurisdictions).
\textsuperscript{21} See De Beers Consol. Mines, Ltd. v. United States, 325 U.S. 212, 217 (1945) (granting writ and reversing injunction issued by district court). Recognizing that the issued injunction fell outside the scope of the case, the Court determined that any harm created by the injunction could not be redressed through a decision on the merits. See id. at 217. The Court therefore held that equity jurisdiction did not reach the issues considered by the district court in granting the injunction. See id. at 221. The Court clarified that mandamus, while not appropriate to correct "mere error," may be used to correct errors arising from lower courts' "usurpation of power." Id. at 217. See also Charles Gardner Geyh, Informal Methods of Judicial Discipline, 142 U. PA. L. REV. 243, 288 (1993) (describing traditional standards for issuance of writ as "exacting").

The author suggests that "power" as used in De Beers is a flexible concept. See id. at 599. While mandamus is inappropriate to review "mere error," mandamus need not be confined to jurisdictional errors. See id.
\textsuperscript{24} See 12 MOORE, supra note 11 at ¶ 63.71 (explaining Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure Rule 21's two-step process to obtain writ of mandamus ordering recusal).
In the landmark case La Buy v. Howes Leather Co., the Supreme Court determined that the federal courts of appeals may properly employ writs of mandamus to perform a supervisory function over the federal district courts. The Court considered this supervisory role essential to the effective administration of justice. La Buy held that the federal courts of appeals may use writs of mandamus to prevent or deter an action of the district court that may or may not occur in the future. This sort of interlocutory appeal circumvents the final decision rule and contradicts the principle of mandamus as an extraordinary remedy.

The notion of advisory mandamus, in which appellate courts advise lower courts on novel questions of law through consideration of mandamus petitions, flows from principles supporting supervisory mandamus. In Schlagenhauf v. Holder, the Supreme Court carved out an exception to the collateral order doctrine in which appellate courts may review novel questions of law on an interlocutory basis. In Schlagenhauf, the petitioner was the first litigant ordered to undergo a physical examination as part of pretrial discovery in a negligence action. The petitioner immediately sought a writ of mandamus from the appellate court, challenging the district court’s power to compel such an examination.

31 See Note, supra note 22 at 611 (explaining appellate court supervision of lower courts may extend to settling novel questions of law).

33 See id. at 110 (holding lower court’s order constituted abuse of discretion that may be addressed through mandamus petition). The petitioner argued that the district court lacked the power to order him to submit to a physical examination because his physical condition was not “in controversy” as defined by Rule 35 of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. Id.

cumvented the final decision rule because it requested review of an order that was neither dispositive nor a final judgment. Nevertheless, the Court declared that when the issue under review in the petition for mandamus is a “basic, undecided question,” an appellate court can properly advise a district court of the contours of the applicable Federal Rule of Civil Procedure. Advisory mandamus thus allows the appellate court to review issues of first impression during the litigation of a case without any finding that the district court has exceeded its jurisdiction.

Following the advent of supervisory and advisory mandamus, the use of the writ has expanded into other areas. For example, in the antitrust litigation producing In re International Business Machines Corporation (IBM), the Second Circuit invoked the writ to order the district court to end the convoluted thirteen-year-long litigation. In the recent asbestos tort case In re DaimlerChrysler Corporation, the Fifth Circuit issued a writ of mandamus ordering the case reassigned on remand. Daimler-Chrysler illustrates mandamus as a form of appellate review that enables litigants to challenge a judge’s denial of a recusal motion without awaiting final judgment.

37 See Schlagenhauf, 379 U.S. at 110 (stating appellate courts may use discretionary powers in determining whether or not to grant writs).

38 See Note, supra, note 22 at 616 (exploring implication of Court’s determination that advisory mandamus may be used to clarify novel issues). The author contends that Schlagenhauf authorizes appellate courts to grant mandamus petitions solely in an effort to expeditiously settle novel questions of law without reference to the traditional mandamus “power” analysis. See id. But see In re Atlantic Pipe Corp., 304 F.3d 135, 139-40 (1st Cir. 2002) (holding petitioner need not show irreparable harm when mandamus petition is advisory in nature). In Atlantic Pipe, petitioner’s opponent argued mandamus was improper because petitioner would not suffer irreparable harm from nonbonding arbitration. See id. Rejecting this argument, the First Circuit held that mandamus was proper because the petition addressed a “systematically important issue as to which the court has not yet spoken.” Id. at 140.

B. Statutory Disqualification Mechanisms

Recusal is the statutory method of judicial disqualification due to disability, bias, or partiality. When a judge is deemed “unable to proceed,” the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure guide his or her replacement. Another judge may proceed with the trial if the original judge is unable to continue because of death, illness, disability, retirement, or resignation. The statutory phrase “unable to proceed” is now also interpreted consistently with disqualification. First, disqualification is warranted where a judge, due to a personal stake in the litigation, has a direct bias either against or in favor of a party. Second, disqualification is required when a judge may be tempted to base his judgments on personal knowledge of the facts at issue.

Courts have construed district court judges’ duty to recuse themselves for bias or prejudice as an objective one requiring judges to avoid effort” to regain impartiality). See also Karen Nelson Moore, Appellate Review of Judicial Disqualification Decisions in the Federal Courts, 35 HASTINGS L.J. 829, 830 (1984) (noting most courts assume propriety of immediate review of denials of recusal motions).

See FED. R. Civ. P. 63 (detailing district court’s power to reassign case when initial trial judge deemed “unable to proceed”). See generally 12 MOORE, supra note 11 ¶ 63.20 (explaining nature and scope of impartiality requirement, as well as standards for determining impartiality). A judge’s impartiality must be evaluated objectively. Id. at ¶ 63.20[4]. Moore observes that “[t]he standard for recusal is whether a reasonable person, with knowledge and understanding of all the relevant facts, would conclude that the judge’s impartiality might reasonably be questioned.” Id.

See FED. R. Civ. P. 63. Rule 63 states the following:

If a trial or hearing has been commenced and the judge is unable to proceed, any other judge may proceed with it upon certifying familiarity with the record and determining that the proceedings in the case may be completed without prejudice to the parties. In a hearing or trial without a jury, the successor judge shall at the request of a party recall any witness whose testimony is material and disputed and who is available to testify again without undue burden. The successor judge may also recall any other witness.

See 12 MOORE, supra note 11 at ¶ 63.03[3] (explaining 1991 rule amendments broadened scope of “inability” to include judicial bias).

See 18 U.S.C. § 455 (2002) (requiring judge’s recusal when he or she has pecuniary interest in litigation, has served as counsel for party, or has family members serving as counsel for party).

See United States v. Microsoft Corp., 56 F.3d 1448, 1463 (1995) (ordering reassignment after determining trial judge based finding on his own research about Microsoft’s practices, not on evidence presented at trial); 12 MOORE, supra note 11, at ¶ 63.20 (detailing disqualification for bias and extrajudicial knowledge). But see Liteky v. United States, 510 U.S. 540, 548-49 (1994) (limiting extrajudicial source doctrine as one factor among many considered in determining judicial bias).
even the appearance of partiality. Judges must recuse themselves when an objective observer could reasonably question their neutrality, regardless of whether they are actually biased.

When the presiding judge does not pursue recusal, a party may move for disqualification. Courts have also noted that a judge has as much of a duty not to recuse him or herself when disqualification is not warranted as to recuse when disqualification is warranted.

C. Mandamus and the Final Decision Rule

The Judicial Code grants the courts of appeals jurisdiction to review “final decisions” from the district courts. Final decisions are generally 51 See Liljeberg v. Health Serv. Acquisition Corp., 486 U.S. 847, 860 (1988) (describing goal of § 455(a) to protect against appearance of partiality). The Court held that the judge need not even be personally aware of the facts giving rise to the appearance of partiality. See id. But see Liljeberg, 486 U.S. at 879 (Rhenquist, C.J., dissenting) (asserting appearance standard did not require judge’s disqualification where judge lacked actual knowledge of financial interest in litigation).

52 See 28 U.S.C. § 455(a) (2002) (stating judge subject to disqualification when partiality reasonably questioned); Liljeberg, 486 U.S. at 860 (characterizing inquiry as independent of judge’s actual knowledge); Leslie W. Abramson, Appearance of Impropriety: Deciding When a Judge’s Impartiality “Might Reasonably Be Questioned,” 14 GEO. LEGAL ETHICS 55, 71 (2000) (noting objective standard requires awareness by judges that observers of judicial process more likely to question judicial impartiality). In Liljeberg, the Court recognized that “people who have not served on the bench are often too willing to indulge suspicions and doubts concerning the integrity of judges.” Liljeberg, 486 U.S. at 864-65. But see Note, Disqualification of Judges and Justices in the Federal Courts, 86 HARV. L. REV. 736, 747 (1973) (considering implications of applying strict applying appearance of bias standard to judicial disqualification analysis). The author posits that an increased willingness by appellate judges to order disqualification of trial judges arguably undermines the presumption of judicial neutrality. See id.

53 See 28 U.S.C. § 144 (permitting parties to file motion and affidavit attesting to judge’s perceived bias and requesting reassignment).

54 See United States v. Bray, 546 F.2d 851, 857 (10th Cir. 1976) (noting affidavits accompanying motion to recuse must establish personal rather than judicial bias). In Bray, the appellant had not only written articles calling for the trial judge’s impeachment, but also collected signatures supporting the judge’s removal. See id. In upholding the trial judge’s denial of appellant’s motion, the court stressed that the appellant must show facts demonstrating the judge’s personal bias or prejudice. See id. That the judge had previously expressed an opinion on a relevant point of law is insufficient to establish personal bias. See id. See also Rosen v. Sugarman, 357 F.2d 794, 797-98 (2d Cir. 1966) (asserting obligation to proceed especially strong, absent colorable claim of prejudice, when judge highly familiar with case).

55 See 28 U.S.C. § 1291. Section 1291 states in pertinent part:

The courts of appeals (other than the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit) shall have jurisdiction of appeals from all final decisions of the district courts of the United States, the United States District Court for the District of the Canal Zone, the District Court of Guam, and the District Court of the Virgin Islands, except where a direct review may be had in the Supreme Court. The juthose decisions that terminate the litigation on the merits and leave the court only to execute the judgment.\textsuperscript{56} The collateral order doctrine, however, creates an exception to the final decision rule.\textsuperscript{57} Interlocutory appeals are traditionally reserved for orders that are conclusive, resolve important questions of law independent of the merits, and are effectively unreview-able on appeal from a final judgment.\textsuperscript{58} Additionally, denial of a motion is not a final order appealable as of right.\textsuperscript{59}

Mandamus has evolved into an accepted medium for interlocutory review of orders denying recusal motions.\textsuperscript{60} In this regard, current practice diverges from the courts' traditional disfavor of mandamus as a medium for interlocutory appeal.\textsuperscript{61} Although a denial of a motion may be appealed from the final judgment, courts have held that postponed appellate review is insufficient to support granting mandamus relief.\textsuperscript{62} In addition, an in-risdiction of the United States Court of Appeals for the Federal Circuit shall be limited to the jurisdiction described in sections 1292(c) and (d) and 1295 of this title.

crease in interlocutory review risks straining the limited resources of the district courts. 63

III. DIFFERING APPROACHES TO APPELLATE REVIEW OF RECUSAL MOTIONS

A. Circuits that Interpret "Appearance" Narrowly

The First Circuit maintains that mandamus is a discretionary writ and should only issue upon a showing of clear error. 64 The First Circuit requires that claims of bias be supported by a factual basis, and that the factual allegations "provide what an objective, knowledgeable member of the public would find to be a reasonable basis for doubting the judge's impartiality." 65 Comments related to the judge's opinion of parties, if based on the party's behavior during the litigation, do not meet the First Circuit's clear error standard. 66 While the recusal statutes aim to preserve the appearance of impartiality, they prohibit reassignment on the basis of unsupported speculation. 67

When evaluating petitions for mandamus alleging judicial bias, the Second, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits employ a three-part test tending to weigh against reassignment. 68 These circuits consider whether the original judge would have substantial difficulty setting aside previously-expressed views 63 See Weinstein, supra note 59 at 281. Judge Weinstein quotes from New York City Housing Development v. Hart, 796 F.2d 976, 978 (7th Cir. 1986), stating that "a practice of ready recusal, coupled with a rule that requires the judge to whom the case is reassigned revisit all of the rulings after the filing of a motion to disqualify, would multiply the work of judges who already have much to do." Id. See also Nelson Moore, supra note 44 (noting propriety of interlocutory review of judges' refusal to recuse entails balancing various interests). Nelson Moore intimates that immediate appellate review of orders denying motions to recuse requires consideration of two basic policies; first, the interest in judicial economy promoted by the final decision rule, and, second, the confidence in neutrality fostered by the disqualification statutes. See id.

64 See In re Marisol Martinez-Catala, 129 F.3d 213, 218 (1st Cir. 1997) (noting mandamus almost always withheld absent demonstration petitioner "clearly" entitled to relief).

The court notes that "recusal on demand would provide litigants with a veto against unwanted judges." Boston's Children First, 244 F.3d at 167.

66 See Martinez-Catala, 129 F.3d at 220 (asserting judge forming negative opinion of party does not necessarily constitute "clear showing" of bias or prejudice).

67 See id. (quoting United States v. Chantel, 902 F.2d 1018, 1023 (1st Cir. 1990)) (stating recusal may not be based on "irrational, highly tenuous speculation").

or findings, whether reassignment is advisable to protect the appearance of justice, and whether reassignment would entail waste and duplication out of proportion to any gain in preserving the appearance of fairness. The three-part test enables courts of appeals to avoid chastising trial judges because, on balance, it reassigns cases in the interest of justice.

B. Circuits that Interpret “Appearance” Broadly

While the Third, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits maintain that mandamus is an extraordinary remedy, they apply a test that tends to favor reassignment on remand. These circuits consider reassignment appropriate where the district court judge engages in conduct that generates an appearance of impropriety or lack of impartiality in the mind of a reasonable member of the public. They also stress that the appearance of an unbiased tribunal is essential to the function of the judiciary "as a neutral, impartial administrator of justice."

The Third Circuit contends that mandamus is an appropriate vehicle to preserve the appearance of an impartial tribunal. Mandamus, in the Third Circuit’s view, fulfills the goal of not only correcting harm to the litigant, but also preserving public confidence in the integrity of the judicial process. The Third Circuit holds that while review on appeal from 71 See Young, supra note 68 (outlining Third, Eleventh, and D.C. Circuits’ test for reassignment).

72 See United States v. Torkington, 874 F.2d 1441, 1446 (11th Cir. 1989) (asserting reassignment warranted when judge’s conduct creates significant risk of undermining public confidence in judicial neutrality); United States v. White, 846 F.2d 678, 695 (11th Cir. 1988) (ordering case reassigned on remand because judge’s rulings adversely affected appearance of justice). In Torkington, the Eleventh Circuit considered the three prongs of the Second Circuit test. Torkington, 874 F.2d at 1447. The court determined that the appearance of impartiality controlled and ordered the case reassigned on remand. See id.

73 See Haines v. Liggett Group, 975 F.2d 81, 98 (3d Cir. 1992) (quoting Torkington, 874 F.2d at 1447) (ordering reassignment after determining judge’s comments published in newspaper harmed appearance of neutrality).

75 See id. (stressing maintaining appearance of justice essential to accomplishing judicial process goals). The court noted that the trial judge need not harbor actual bias final judgment may cure harm to the litigant, it fails to adequately cure harm to public faith in judicial neutrality.

C. Seventh Circuit Procedural Rule

The Seventh Circuit frames the issue procedurally, requiring litigants to move for mandamus immediately after the judge grants or denies a recusal motion under § 144. The court reviews a district court judge’s denial of a motion to recuse for abuse of discretion or a showing of prejudice, but only if the petitioner requests a writ of mandamus immediately following the denial. Failure to request the writ at that time constitutes waiver. Consequently, when a litigant raises a judicial bias argument for the first time on appeal, the Seventh Circuit applies a plain error standard of review. District court judges are presumed impartial, and the writ is not granted readily.

D. Fifth Circuit Flexible Test

With its recent DaimlerChrysler decision, the Fifth Circuit signaled that it will continue to consider both tests in determining whether reassignment on remand is warranted, but declined to definitively adopt either approach. In DaimlerChrysler, the district court judge characterized the defendant automakers’ behavior as “the most manipulative and craven against the defendant to render mandamus proper. See id. Rather, reassignment serves to promote public confidence in the judicial process. See id.

76 See Madden v. Myers, 102 F.3d 74, 78 (3d Cir. 1996) (holding mandamus petitions challenging failure to recuse not prohibited by Prison Litigation Reform Act). In Madden, the court echoed Primerica’s assertion that mandamus petitions for reassignment assist in curing not only harm to the litigants in a specific case, but also harm to the public’s perception of the judicial process. See id. In addition, Madden is an example of mandamus in the criminal context. See id. at 77.

77 See 12 MOORE, supra note 11 at ¶ 63.71 (describing Seventh Circuit procedural requirements).

78 See United States v. Towns, 913 F.2d 434, 443 (7th Cir. 1990) (holding criminal defendant’s appeal from final decision of trial judge’s refusal to recuse not properly preserved). The court makes clear that unlike motions to recuse for actual bias under § 144, denials of motions brought pursuant to § 455 must be immediately appealed through a petition for mandamus. See id.

79 See United States v. Sidener, 876 F.2d 1334, 1336 (7th Cir. 1989) (holding defendant’s recusal argument waived by failure to petition for mandamus immediately after denial of recusal motion).

80 See United States v. Ramusack, 928 F.2d 780, 784 (7th Cir. 1991) (applying plain error standard to bias argument raised for first time on appeal).

81 See United States v. Baskes, 687 F.2d 165, 170 (7th Cir. 1981) (stating petitioner bears “substantial burden” in overcoming presumption of judicial impartiality).

82 See DaimlerChrysler, 294 F.3d at 701 (stating Fifth Circuit’s precedent has “expressly declined” to adopt one specific test).
approach to litigation that [the] Court [had] ever witnessed." The Fifth Circuit, citing various other opinions expressed by the district court judge, held that the evidence of bias met the requirements for both tests. In DaimlerChrysler, the Fifth Circuit declined to delineate a standard to govern mandamus petitions requesting reassignment.

IV. THE BROADENING SCOPE OF SUPERVISORY MANDAMUS

Public confidence in judicial independence is essential to the judiciary’s legitimacy, especially during periods of intense political polarization. Recent political debate suggests that the citizenry values and demands an independent judiciary. The judicial branch derives its power from the citizenry’s belief that the judicial process is a neutral one capable of resolving legal disputes without regard to the political, socioeconomic, cultural, or ethnic attributes of the parties. Therefore, preserving not only the reality, but also the appearance of impartiality remains a fundamental concern of the judiciary.

Although mandamus petitions requesting appellate review of recusal motions circumvent the final decision rule, they perform a legitimate and important function by promoting public confidence in judicial independence. As the DaimlerChrysler decision illustrates, however, the maze of criteria employed by the courts of appeals in determining whether or not to grant mandamus petitions ordering recusal and reassignment offers litigants little consistency across circuits.

The Fifth Circuit test allows appellate courts the flexibility to examine recusal issues on a case-by-case basis, weighing the facts and circumstances of each case with the importance of preserving the appearance of impartiality.
neutrality. The Seventh Circuit procedural approach provides litigants clear guidelines and preserves the presumption of judicial neutrality. A test combining the flexibility of the Fifth Circuit’s test with the clarity of the Seventh’s would prevent burdening the courts with frivolous and untimely mandamus petitions while promoting public confidence in the judicial process.

V. CONCLUSION

Recent public debate examining the impartiality of Supreme Court Justices demonstrates that appearances do matter.

The American judicial system is a source of great pride to Americans; inextricably linked to that pride is the presumption that the system is impartial and unbiased. Those who sit on the bench shoulder the burden of upholding the integrity of the system not only in fact, but also in spirit.

Mandamus petitions seeking interlocutory appellate review of recusal motions provide an important mechanism for promoting public faith in the judicial process. Such petitions further the goal of ensuring that all those who approach the courthouse door do so with utmost confidence that justice is administered freely, unfettered by bias or predisposition.
