HISTORICAL HIGHLIGHTS

of PORTUGESE IMMIGRANTS

By Armando Perry

There are living in Providence and Rhode Island Portuguese who emigrated here from the Azores and Madeira. The number of these Portuguese is said to be between 25,000 and 30,000. The Portuguese are said to be the largest foreign ethnic group in the state.

This article is designed to give a brief history of the Portuguese in the state, and to show their influence in the state.

In 1850, the first wave of Portuguese immigrants arrived in the state. They were predominantly from the Azores, and came to work in the mines and factories. They were followed by a second wave of immigrants in the 1870s, who came to work in the textile mills.

The Portuguese community began to take shape in the late 19th century. They established churches, schools, and social clubs, and formed their own political organizations. They were active in the state's political life, and played a role in the state's economy.

The Portuguese community continued to grow in the 20th century. They established more churches, schools, and social clubs, and formed more political organizations. They were active in the state's political life, and played a role in the state's economy.

NEWPORT YOUTH DROWNS

Vernon Grandison of Rev. Jeter

A 14-year-old boy, Vernon Grandison, was found dead in the Newport Yacht Club on July 7.

The boy had been swimming with a group of friends in the Newport Yacht Club. The friends had left the area and the boy was last seen swimming alone. The friends returned and found the boy floating in the water. They immediately called for help and Atlantic CIub arn staff arrived on the scene.

The boy was taken to the Newport Hospital where he was pronounced dead. An autopsy is scheduled for tomorrow.

The family has been notified and will be notified by the coroner. The cause of death is not known at this time.

BRITISH CHAMPIONS FIGHT PETERSON AFRAID TO RISK TITLES

London, England—After Jack Egan, the British middleweight champion, fought a hard battle with American middleweight contender Joe Peterson, the referee declared a draw. Peterson, who had been favored by many experts, was unable to take the lead in the final rounds. Egan, on the other hand, fought a strong defensive game and refused to be ejected from the ring. The match was hotly contested, with both fighters displaying exceptional skill and courage.
