Suffolk supports Haiti

Students come together to celebrate Haitian culture and raise money

The Suffolk community came together last Thursday in support of the people of Haiti, which suffered a devastating 7.0 magnitude earthquake last month. The event, A Taste of Haiti, was co-sponsored by the Black Student Union, College Democrats, Mock Trial Team, Student Political Science Association, Mirembe on My Mind, Caribbean Student Network, and the Suffolk University Hispanic Association.

Students, faculty, and staff gathered on the fourth floor of Donahue and paid two dollars a plate to eat Haitian food, and listen to traditional Haitian music. The event was promoted through e-mail, flyers, the Suffolk University website, Facebook, and Twitter.

Several students who stood in line had never experienced Haitian food before. "I love trying new foods," said Sophomore Kaela Gallo. "I think this is great, it's a good way to raise money and get people together to talk about what happened." Those who were unfamiliar with the details of the tragedy in Haiti were informed about it by speakers and their peers. "I think it is very helpful for anyone who came," said Emily Sinnam, a junior. "Plus, students love food!" "It's good for Suffolk students to experience [other] cultures like this. I'm glad it's getting a lot of attention, and there are a lot of students here," said Jocelyn Ferraro, 2012. "The idea originated from the College Democrats, who then proposed the idea to the Black Student Union and many other groups," said Jessica Ross, President of the Black Student Union. "Each group sent a student representative to each planning meeting and each group's Executive Board members volunteered the day of the event."

Tabitha Cherilus, Vice President of the Black Student Union, was one of the first to speak to the room. Cherilus is Haitian, and mentioned her family's suffering. "On behalf of all clubs, I'd like to thank you all for coming and for your support.

Several Haitian students attended the event and shared their stories of the earthquake. "My family is in Port-au-Prince; their houses were affected, but..." see HAITI page 2

Republican candidate pitches bid for Governor

Republican Gubernatorial candidate Charlie Baker came to Suffolk last Thursday to speak about his bid for the Governor's office in an event hosted by Suffolk Law's Rappaport Center for Law and Public Service. The event was the first in the 2010 Gubernatorial Speaker Series.

After being introduced, Baker, who was raised in Needham Mass., spoke for roughly half an hour about his background, his reasons for running, and what he would do if elected.

"I'm the product of a mixed marriage. My mom's a Democrat and my dad's a Republican and I grew up listening to the two of them battle it out at the kitchen table," said Baker, stressing the importance of a balanced government. "I learned at a very early age that checks and balances are a good thing. Both sides make the other smarter if they have to work a little harder." Baker served as Secretary of Health and Human Services in the early 1990s under Republican Gov. Bill Weld and used this as an example of how he has had to work with Democrats to get things accomplished. After serving as Health Secretary, Baker became the CEO of Harvard Pilgrim just after it was placed into receivership.

they’re okay now. My uncle’s wife was pregnant and had a C-section; it’s the worst time to have a baby,” said freshman Tanya Jules. Juliette Laguerre, also a freshman, has family in Port-au-Prince as well. “One of my cousins was trapped for two hours, but he and my family are okay now,” she said. “I am so happy [A Taste of Haiti] is going on.”

For a donation of two dollars, attendees could fill their plates with a variety of Haitian food catered from Sunrise Caribbean Cuisine (Somerville, Mass), a Haitian-American family-owned restaurant. Dishes included steamed vegetables, plantains, baked macaroni and cheese, green peas, rice, curried chicken, conch with pickled sauce, fried pork, chicken, red beans, and chicken and beef patties. The baked macaroni and cheese, chicken patties, and rice with peas were among the favorite selections of students.

“We wanted to make a difference, and this is definitely working,” said Kris Callahan, Vice President of the Suffolk Democrats. “It looks like people are donating more than just two dollars for a plate.”

“It’s also that organizations can be donated to through the computers that are set up,” said sophomore Daniel Mann, Treasurer of the Suffolk Democrats. “It looks like people are donating more than just two dollars for a plate.”

“I am very proud Suffolk felt they had an obligation to answer the call to do something about it.”

The room buzzed with the upbeat music and positive energy. Attendees were enjoying the event as they spoke with friends and members of the sponsoring groups. Francia Cordia, a graduate student in Suffolk’s Government Department, was staying in Haiti at her father’s house in Delmas during the earthquake. “It’s an experience I would not want anyone to have,” she said. “I was stuck, I couldn’t move. Seeing people dying around me, I didn’t know what to do. The next day when I was about to get my sister with her kids, there were dead people on the streets everywhere.”

Cordia spoke about the children in Haiti, and wondered how the country will cope with all of them. She mentioned a mother who lost six of her seven children. “As a Haitian person, I’m not happy with the way things are. We don’t know what can happen.” Cordia did not want to leave her father, and she changed her flight back to the U.S. a number of times. “Seeing the state the country is in, I don’t want to sit here in America and not be with the people back home.”

She stressed that she refuses to remain silent about it. Both cash and online donations were accepted. Ribbons and raffle tickets were also sold. A grand total of $668 was raised in cash, exceeding the original $500 goal.

“I am very proud of the co-sponsoring organizations for coming together and creating such a successful event,” said Ross. “I am also thankful and pleased with the amount of students, faculty, and staff who attended the event and donated to Haiti.”
Suffolk strikes a deal with MGH

Students get additional access to health care

The following letter was sent out to all students in a campus-wide email:

We are pleased to announce that the University has entered into an important agreement with Massachusetts General Hospital (MGH), which benefits all of our students and will provide additional access to care for students when the University’s Health & Wellness Services Office is closed. The Walk-In Unit is conveniently located on the MGH Main Campus, which is just off of Cambridge Street near the Suffolk University campus. In addition, an MGH physician will be available on campus during designated weekday hours to assist the University’s Health & Wellness Services Office with patient care. We will be providing you with detailed information about the program with MGH in the near future on the Health & Wellness Services Web site. Achieving our agreement with MGH to provide for expanded medical services to our student community is a further indication of the dramatic growth of the University. We are pleased to be undertaking this association with MGH and look forward to a long and constructive partnership for the benefit of all students in the University.

Suffolk Law School opens new clinic

Students to provide counsel for wronged small investors

A new law clinic, the Investor Advocacy Clinic, has opened at Suffolk Law School for small investors who feel they have been wronged illegally by investment advisors. The clinic was funded by a $250,000 grant from the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority (FINRA) Investor Education Foundation with the purpose of providing for investors who do not have the financial resources to hire a lawyer.

"People are pretty excited about clinics in general," said second-year law student Tristan Colangelo. "It's a pretty big aspect of things and a lot of them fill up quickly."

Clinics give law students a chance at practicing law for class credit. It allows students to take on client responsibilities, have their own clients, or represent clients in court.

"You're able to be part of the clinic, which means you have the duties of an actual lawyer and you work under someone who has passed the Bar," said Colangelo. "It's your selling point. From the second you step in, you have to make your resume better. It helps a lot."

With the clinic's opening, students seem to be getting excited for new opportunities to act as attorneys for real clients. "I'm graduating in a semester," said law student Jay Wadman, "but I'm glad to hear that there's a new clinic."

"I cannot wait. I'm very excited!" said second-year law student Kristi Kerwin. "It's always open to everyone, it has limited space and preference is given to students who have taken specific classes through the law school. The $250,000 grant has given us more opportunities to students as well as new options for the clinic. With the new money, Suffolk Law decided to hire David Gibbs, an experienced Boston litigator, as practitioner-in-residence and co-director. "Our goal is to give ordinary investors crucial assistance in vindicating their rights and at the same time teach students how to provide first-class representation to clients," said Gibbs.

Pro-Life is not Anti-Choice

Nicole Espinosa

Super Bowl Sunday had a new controversy surrounding it this year when CBS chose to air a pro-life commercial. The feminists of our country immediately assumed their regular positions whining, how anyone dare take their rights for free speech up to the level of disagreeing with abortion?

Tim Tebow, a quarter back for the Florida Gators, and his mother joined together with the conservative, Christian organization Focus on the Family to create a positive ad depicting the benefits his mother experienced by choosing life. She was advised by doctors to abort her child because of pregnancy complications, and decided against it, thus Tim Tebow was born.

Last week on CBS’s Evening News, Katie Couric hinted that Focus on the Family shouldn’t be spending money on ads, claiming that they recently laid off hundreds of people and then spent millions on this advertisement. The money for the ad, however, came almost completely from donations. The ad itself is very short, and includes Tebow’s mother shortly discussing her choice for life, and the importance of family. Compared to some ads, websites, and even fliers posted by many pro-life organizations, which can include grotesque images of unborn children, fetuses that have been aborted, and that blatantly condemn abortion, this ad has taken a more positive stance.

ABUJA, Nigeria—Ailing Nigerian President Umaru Yar’Adua was forced by the National Assembly to cede his power to Vice President Goodluck Jonathan until he is fit to assume office again. Yar’Adua, 59, was hospitalized in Saudi Arabia with a serious heart condition on Nov. 23, according to APP. The move made by the Nigerian government has caused political tension with opposition parties. “What has happened today has taken Nigeria closer to the abyss, instead of bringing it back from the brink. All hell has broken loose,” said Action Congress, the main opposition party, in a statement. Bayo Okunade, a University of Ibadan political scientist told the APP that “[The General Assembly’s] decision is a pre-emptive action to prevent a military takeover.”

MARJAH, Afghanistan — U.S. forces plan to attack the last Taliban stronghold in Marjah and have announced it to the entire world. It is expected to be NATO’s biggest operation since the War on Terror started in 2001. “I think there’s a certain strength in the Pashtunwali culture just from laying it out there in saying, ‘Hey, we are coming. Deal with it,'” said Brigadier General Larry Nicholson. The city of Marjah is said to have about 100,000 people living in the area, as well as the richest farmlands in all of Afghanistan. These farmlands have been known for the large amount of poppy fields, keeping the drug trade large and prominent. A proposed anti-homosexual bill in Uganda stirred up LGBT activists in Boston enough to take action in a protest last Thursday night in front of the John F. Kennedy Federal Building. The rally, organized by Anti-Violence Project of Massachusetts and Join the Impact MA, protested an American fundamentalist’s homophobic teachings in Africa. A right-wing group called “The Family” was accused by the protesters to be linked to the draft of the anti-gay bill in Uganda. The bill in Uganda threatens gays by convicting them for a minimum of a life sentence in prison. People who engage in homosexual acts more than once, have sex with a minor, or test positive for HIV may be executed. Even people who know about homosexual activities but do not report them can risk being imprisoned for three years. According to a CNN article, this “bill forbids the promotion of homosexuality, which, in effect, bans organizations working in HIV and AIDS prevention.”

“I think it’s awful and I think it’s an outpouring of frustration on fundamentalism as part of the US that they’re starting to feed into other countries,” said Matthew Dimick, a graduate student at Boston University. “I think it’s a misappropriation of Christianity. It’s a misappropriation of the mission effort in Africa and turning it into something that’s terrible and evil. Its genocide.”

Dimick, along with other protestors, gathered to hear speakers from different organizations speak out about the anti-homosexual bill in Uganda. Rev. Dr. Kappy Kaoma, who is also a Project Director at Political Research Associates, and an Anglican priest from Zambia, spoke to the crowd about the American groups that are aiding the bill in Uganda and asked people to stand up to injustice. "We are here drinking coffee and having breakfast when our brothers and sisters are faced with death," said Kaoma. "Friends, the time has come to stand up." Other speakers took their places speaking to the protestors including Kate Leslie, Co-Chair of Join the Impact MA. "I think it’s really critical for people here in the United States to speak out against this because it’s really not about what’s happening abroad, it’s really about how the United States and right wing evangalical groups based in America are supported and promoting hate abroad," said Leslie. "Therefore, I think it’s absolutely critical that we don’t stay silent. Just because it’s not happening in our own backyard does not mean we should not get involved.”

Even students from Brookline High School came to show their support, bringing signs and cheering for speeches. "Our school is doing a writing campaign where we are writing letters to the UN to put pressure on them to fix this," said sophomore Christopher Jansky. The anti-homosexual bill draft bill in Uganda is in the committee stage with Ugandan Parliament as many actively search for a way to stop the bill from passing. “I think, in any situation with something so despicable and so awful, you have to shine a light on it,” said Dimick. "You bring attention to it. Already the attention drawn to it is creating change and creating awareness. [We need to] give people that information and giving people the knowledge of what’s happening and making people aware in our country that this isn’t acceptable. [We need to] hold the UN accountable for what they’re supposed to be standing for.”

The Human Rights Watch has been watching this bill since it was drafted in early October, 2009. With the draft bill still standing, protestors, activists, and organizations continue to fight its discrimination and violation of human rights. "This draft bill is clearly an attempt to divide and weaken civil society by striking at one of its most marginalized groups," said Scott Long, director of the LGBT Rights Program at Human Rights Watch. "The government may be starting here, but who will be next?"
This week, from Feb. 11 to Feb. 14, the Suffolk Theater Department is running its annual Spring Showcase, a chance for theater students to realize their own creative visions to bring to life on stage. All of the plays are student-directed and they all share the themes of life, death, and rebirth.

Reverse Transcription by Tony Kushner, an award winning playwright known best for Angels in America, is being directed by Bryan Daley. It's an ensemble piece about six playwrights burying a good friend (also a playwright) who are forced to come to terms with their own mortality, as well as their own obscurity. The play focuses heavily on loss and oblivion and how they affect the way we think and value our own lives.

"The cast rehearsed only for three to four weeks but they were able to get a good understanding of the play," said Daley, and he couldn't be more right. The play features Ryan Baker, Joe Gianoni, Alex Lawless, Nicole Lee, Deidre McAlister, Jess Miller and Joe Talluto. The Pronoun I, by Tennessee Williams, is a lost play that was considered to be experimental in its time. The Pronoun I is the story of a Queen ruling over a decaying kingdom with her lover, all while a revolution pounds at her door. The play seems to be a metaphor for the cycle of life and reincarnation, as well as the conflict between youth and vitality as well as sterility and obligation. Things grow old, die, and are born again. The Pronoun I did have a bit of cast troubles when one of the actors had his appendix removed. Even though the cast had to work around it, they were still able to pull off a terrific performance. The Pronoun I is being directed by Linsey Eagle and features Sal Forte, Bethany Koerner, Sara Chounchaisit, Andrew Fairley, Ryan Honig, Kevin Hadfield, Maile Paillet, Sara Pardo, Meghan Pelletier and Adam Santanelli. Spring Showcase will run this Thursday-Saturday at 8 p.m. and Sunday and Saturday at 3 p.m. in the Studio Theatre, located on the fourth floor of the Archer Building. Admission is free and open to the public.

Many artists performed at this year's Grammy's, but only a couple captivated all viewers. Beyonce, of course, shocked the Staples Center by singing her hit "If I Were a Boy" and then suddenly bursting out a cover of Alanis Morissette's "You Oughtta Know." You couldn't know that Beyonce gave the song a revved-up beat and sang it so well that Morissette really was given a run for her Canadian money. Another interesting performance was Lady Gaga, but when isn't Lady Gaga interesting? Her collaboration with Elton John started with Gaga coming out on stage singing her dance hit "Poker Face" and then being thrown into a fire pit by one of her dancers. She then came out under the fire pit on a double piano with Elton John, and the two sang and switched between Gaga's "Speechless" and Elton's "Your Song." Both of their faces were covered in black, chalky smears and they were wearing intense eye makeup, but their voices flowed really well together as the audience went wild. Lady Gaga took home two Grammy's at the end of the night: one for Best Dance Recording ("Poker Face"), and one for Best Electron-Dance Album (The Fame).

Of course, this year's Grammy's had to include a tribute to the late Michael Jackson, in honor of how he influenced the music industry and inspired most of the artists in the business today. Celine Dion, Jennifer Hudson, Smokey Robinson, Carrie Underwood and Usher all put their souls into singing Jackson's "Earth Song" while a 3-D video played on the screens on stage with clips of rain forests and little children running through them. It truly moved all the artists in the crowd and all of the viewers watching from home, and made for yet another successful Grammy Awards.
The Man Column: V-Day

John Edwards, I spit on you

Cait O'Callaghan
Journal Contributor

Spitting in someone's face is the most disrespectful thing you can do. John Edwards, two-time presidential candidate, deserves buckets of spit to be thrown at his face.

First, Edwards cheated on his wife of 32 years. Elizabeth Edwards is the mother of four of his children, and a breast cancer survivor. Unfortunately, the cancer returned in March 2007, and this time, it doesn't look like Elizabeth will be as successful. She was diagnosed with stage four breast cancer, and it has now spread to her bones and her lungs. She will die of cancer between now and the next few years. How could this man...she has a disgusting father.

Okay John Edwards, so not only did you lie to your family and to your whole country, but now you're going to try to deny this child, when clearly, this is your baby. The bucket of spit continues to be filled.

Almost a year and a half went by when Edwards made a startling announcement. On Jan. 21, he admitted, "I am Quinn's father. I will do everything in my power to provide her with the love and support she deserves. It was wrong for me ever to deny she was my daughter and hopefully, one day, when she understands, she will forgive me." How can this man be any more disgusting?

On top of everything else, Young recently told the world that a sex tape of Edwards and Hunter does exist, and is currently in his possession. Young claims he and his wife "were offered millions for that stupid tape." Edwards is currently taking Young and his wife, Cheri, to court in North Carolina in order to retrieve the tape. It doesn't matter if Elizabeth Edwards is a monster, or a controller, or any of the other things Young reports she is in his book. John Edwards should not have been the horrible man he is, and in the end, he lost the country he really is. First, he lies to his family. Then, he cheats on his dying wife. Next, he denies his love child, and then later tries to apologize and admit to fathering this poor girl who will one day realize that she has a disgusting father.

And to top it all off, he has a sex tape with his mistress. This man appeared to be a great American hero, but he finally has taken off the mask and revealed himself to the whole country. We all witnessed what positive campaigns can accomplish with the recent election of Senator Scott Brown. And yet, feminists around the country are thinking of new, negative meaning for the acronym "CBS." Still, however, the whining pro-abortionists of our country continue to insist that the ad was not pro-life so much as an "anti-choice" which is what many are calling the ad. The supposed-to-be-open-mindedness of the feminists across our country is being disproved once again. They're pro-choice, but there's only one choice and you had better not disagree with it. Props to CBS for sticking to it, because if they had caved and not run the ad, the spoiled brats we call feminists would be seeing theirProgress to CBS for sticking to it, because if they had caved and not run the ad, the spoiled brats we call feminists would be seeing their
Zinn's life was a testament to possibility

The teenager in mourns the late, great J.D. Salinger

James Carroll
Distinguished Scholar in Residence

Howard Zinn had just buckled his seat belt when the flight attendant came over the speakers with the pre-flight routine – the welcome aboard and identification of crew members. At mention of the pilot's name, Zinn's eyes lifted, and he wondered - could it be the same man? Years before, Zinn, and fellow anti-war activist Father Daniel Berrigan, had traveled to Hanoi for the purpose of accepting the release from North Vietnam of three American prisoners of war - downed US flyers. They were the first prisoners to be released, but the condition was that they be handed over not to American officials, but to representatives of the anti-war movement.

The three prisoners were subdued and skeptical - obviously beaten down by their ordeal. The empathy Zinn felt was rooted in his own having been an Army Air Forces bomber pilot during World War II. Zinn and Berrigan reassured them, and soon the five men were flown out of Hanoi - freedom! While changing planes in Laos, they were intercepted by the US ambassador, who took custody of the POWs. Zinn wished them luck, and that was the last he had ever seen of them.

But now he had just heard the name of one of the three - the man at the controls of his airliner. Could it be? When the flight was underway, Zinn asked an attendant to tell the pilot his name. Soon, the captain came walking down the aisle. They recognized each other, exchanged a friendly greeting - and that was it. Some moments in life are too multi-layered for words. When Zinn told me this story, he said he was glad to see the man looking well, but that their brief meeting left him feeling sad.

Beyond acknowledgment, there was simply no way to reckon with what they had shared. For Zinn's part, he realized that the intense bond he felt with the former POW was unbroken.

I thought of that encounter when Zinn died last week. It embodied what he set apart from other powerful figures of radical criticism. Yes, his rebukes of war-making, racism, and inequality were always stinging. But Zinn's uncompromising readiness to speak truth to power (a cliché he would have never used) came hand-in-hand with a rare capacity for human connection.

While many social critics of class ranking, for example, reproduce the hierarchy with moral ranking, putting themselves at the top, Zinn was never about ranking. In saying what he thought, he never made a self-important display of erudition. Attuned to complexity, he refused to be imprisoned by it. The way to end the Vietnam war, he argued with stunning simplicity, was to end it - a position enunciated in 1967 as naive, but embraced in 1973 as national strategy. In the difference of timing between Zinn's early stance and Washington's later one were buried hundreds of thousands of corpses.

The most striking fact of his life story, what set him apart from every other left-wing prophet of the movement heyday, is that his voice continued to be heard, generation in and generation out. Wherever he went, young people - high school students, as well as college - flocked to his lectures and lined up to greet him. He saw it in the late 1960s and I saw it a couple of months ago. Why was that? The young recognized two rare gifts in Zinn. He could share the wisdom of his long work as a professional philosopher and intellectual - but without in any way condescending. Zinn genuinely believed that young people have a special capacity for ethical action - and he always did.

Secondly, even as he blistered the hypocrisies of conventional thought, they always heard from him a profound message of hope. Unlike many radicals, he was no mere denouncer. He so believed in America that he believed it could transcend itself. He lifted up alternative futures, and insisted they were possible. Indeed, Zinn's life was a testament to possibility, as all who revere his memory know from their own experience.

Zinn's life was a testament to possibility

Holden's last hurrah

The teenager in me mourns the late, great J.D. Salinger

Alex Pearlman

The critic Arthur Mizener once called J.D. Salinger "the most avidly read author of any serious pretensions in his generation." That is a true statement. But Mizener, when he wrote that in 1959, didn’t account for the fact that Salinger would be the most avidly read author of any generation since.

I have read Catcher in the Rye, conservatively, about 40 times. The book, which was at the same time the most banned and the most frequently taught book in U.S. public schools in 1950s, is, to me, a classic of epic proportions.

As I dove into it headfirst the first time, I knew right away that it would be my favorite book, but I didn’t know the first time I read it that it would lead me through trauma after drama, through public school, through boarding school, through best friends and boyfriends, through college and through everything in between.

Every time I read the book, it says something different to me. Holden is one of the lone, cynical, heartwarming, innocent and rebellious characters in American literature. And Salinger himself wasn’t far from that description.

He was an impressionable person, jumping from idea to idea, never quite settling on anything. He was a Zen Buddhist, a Scientologist, a Hindu, and a disaffected recluse. Some might even say that he was so obsessed with his work - being a writer - that it was what eventually drove him to the madness so many now associate with him.

Before he was the mysterious character that grew up hoping to meet one day and have a cup of tea (spiked with something) with, Salinger was writing stories instead of paying attention in class.

His first publishing was a story called "The Young Folks," which was published in 1940. After Salinger returned from World War II, "A Perfect Day for Bananafish" was published in The New Yorker. It was the first story about Salinger’s imaginary family of former vaudevilleians, the Glasses, and their seven wild children, all of whom were featured in other various stories, including another best-seller, Franny and Zooey.

After Catcher in the Rye was published in 1953 and Salinger became a cultural icon, he was approached with movie deals that eventually fell through and was the subject of newspaper stories that painted him in a light that he didn’t approve of. He wrote a number of other short stories and poems, but became increasingly reclusive until he vanished completely in the late 1980s.

On the subject of Franny and Zooey, he wrote, "It is my rather subservient opinion that a writer's feelings of anonymity-obscenity and a sense of paying attention to valuable property on loan to him."

Salinger continued to write while stowed away in the New Hampshire woods, but many of his stories have never seen the light of day. He explained that he had no interest in publishing them, but recent reports say that there may be as many as 15 unpublished manuscripts.

In the end, Salinger died an enigma. He was a fantastic writer who captured the essence of adolescence in a way that many have attempted to replicate, but none have ever been able to. It’s for this reason that every time I open my copy of the book (its formerly white exterior now a well-loved shade of yellow) I drop into Holden’s mind and the words, Salinger’s and Holden’s, are always the same. They’re always there to offer some advice or criticism.

Salinger was a master wordsmith, one of the best in American history, whose views on our teenage lifestyle and culture were flawless and true - no one else’s will ever compare.

Hemingway once described Salinger as having "helluva talent" and a number of other writers have credited Salinger as their biggest influence, including John Updike and Philip Roth. I know he’s been mine. He was one of the last gasp of teenage angst heard round the world. He will be missed.

Here are some "Helpful Hints" for your next move...

• Utilities – don't forget to schedule a transfer for the utilities. This includes cancelling any services you currently have, as well as making arrangements for your new place. We recommend contacting your cable/internet provider in advance, as they seem to have the longest lead time.

• Building Policies – be sure to determine if your current or new building/management company has any "move in/out" policies. We encourage you to pay special attention to elevator reservations and restrictions on days of the week or time frames.

• Also, be sure to inquire with your property management company and/or landlord about your mailbox key and ensure your name is on the mailbox. You wouldn't want to miss out on any house warming gifts!

Where will the final season take them?

For five seasons, Lost has been an epic mind-trip of smoke-monsters, space-time continuums, and secret societies. For those who haven’t gone down the rabbit hole, Lost is about the survivors of a plane crash who end up on a mysterious island. At this point of the series, several characters, known as the “Oceanic Six,” have returned to the island to save those they left behind. However, in typical Lost fashion, season six (the final season), shows us that saving everyone is going to be pretty damn difficult.

The final season presents “a struggle between good and evil, faith and science, and the progress of humanity.”

a greater problem than just leaving the island. It becomes a struggle between good and evil, faith and science, and the progress of humanity. With every question answered, a whole slate of new questions arise, and with every minor resolution to a plot, a new twist is presented. The premier of season six is just as perplexing. With 18 produced hours finished and the episode count still unresolved, the show is leaving everyone as lost as ever.

The season begins in an unlikely place: the cabin of Oceanic flight 815 to LAX. This time, however, the plane lands safely, and the viewer quickly realizes this is not flash back. Lost presents an alternate reality. Alongside this plot line, we have the same 815 survivors taking refuge in a mysterious temple. Not much is known about the temple’s dwellers other than they have ties to Jacob, the leader of the island. Jacob was killed by his nemesis via Ben in the finale of season five, which shocks those of the temple. This nemesis, like Jacob, appears to have different special abilities, due the island. Both have been on the island for multiple centuries, but while Jacob remains in human form and doesn’t age, his nemesis is only seen in the form of the deceased on the island, or a pillar of black smoke.

New faces arise in the cast, such as the mysterious temple-dwelling alchemist, Dogen, and his John Lennon-doppelgänger-translator. Familiar faces like Jack Shepard and Hugo Reyes grace the television, but we part with characters like Juliet Burke and we find out that John Locke is finally dead (for real). As Frank Lapidus and Sun-Hwa Kwon sit dumbfounded beneath the shadow of the statue, James “Sawyer” Ford ventures off alone only to be followed by Kate Austin. Jin-Soo Kwon stumbles across Claire Littleton, welding a rifle and looking disheveled, very different from when we last saw her in season four. Needless to say, the plot thickens.

Lost has been an excellent show, using flashbacks and flashfowards to enlighten us on plot and character developments, but this “alternate reality” of the flight 815 that lands safely in LAX running alongside the action on the island leaves many viewers guessing. One would assume that the two plot-lines will intersect, but it will take true intellect to pull this one all together.

Beginning to tie up all the loose ends, viewers that have been waiting five and a half years are finding out all the answers to the questions they’ve had. Somehow after every turn, there is at least a glimmer of resolution. Hopefully before the series finale ends, this whole thing will finally make sense. Or it won’t. L O S T.

After 42 years of ineptitude, the New Orleans Saints are finally Super Bowl Champions. The city of New Orleans is now the center of the football world.

In a game that was closer than the final score indicated, the Saints defeated Peyton Manning and the Indianapolis Colts, 31-17. Trailing by ten points at the end of the first quarter, things looked bleak for the “Who Dat!” faithful. Howev­er, by halftime the Saints had cut the Colt lead to 10-6, after one of two game changing decisions by head coach Sean Payton.

Trailing 10-3, and facing a fourth and goal from the one-yard line, Payton decided against a chip-shot field goal and instead sent out his offense. The Colt defense rose to the occasion and stuffed running back Pierre Thomas at the two. This would prove to be crucial. Had the Saints kicked the field goal, the Colts would have gone into their two-minute offense and Manning would have been throwing the ball all over the field, a situation that normally leads to six points. Instead, the Colts were forced to play it safe and run the ball, leaving under a minute to play and great field position for the Saints follow­ing the resulting punt. The Saints took advantage of the opportunity, got into field goal range and kicker Garrett Hartley did the rest.

After a week halftime show by “The Who,” Payton did something that shocked most viewers and completely threw the Colts out of sync. Instead of kicking off to Manning and the Colt offense, he went for an onside kick. New Orleans recovered and soon after took a 15-10 lead. This was a move that not only changed the game, but made Payton look like a genius. Had the Colts recovered the kick, they would have had the opportunity to take advantage of their two-minute offense and Manning would have been throwing the ball all over the field, a situation that normally leads to six points. Instead, the Colts were forced to play it safe and run the ball, leaving under a minute to play and great field position for the Saints follow­ing the resulting punt. The Saints took advantage of the opportunity, got into field goal range and kicker Garrett Hartley did the rest.

With his team trailing late in the game, Manning, faced with a moment that could have cemented his legacy as one of the greatest quarterbacks ever, threw a lazy pass towards wide receiver Reggie Wayne that was intercepted by Tracy Porter who returned it for a touchdown. Check mate, match point, game over. On a drive that could have tied the game and sent the game into overtime, Manning made what may be the biggest football mistake of his life. It was a Brett Favre-esque pass in the most critical of situations. Down 14 points after the inter­ception, Manning once again drove the Colts down into Saints territory, but his fourth down pass fell incomplete, and the Saints were champions.

On Super Sunday, the best team usually wins, not the best player. The Saints proved what many had thought through­out the regular season: They were the best team in football in 2009. The questions about Peyton Manning’s legacy will linger throughout the entire off-season. Manning, consid­ered by some to be the greatest player of his generation and possibly the best quar­terback in NFL history, still has only one Super Bowl ring. Although not quite the Dan Marino of his time (after all, Marino never won a ring), Man­ning is being compared to a va­riety of other great players who were all-world, but couldn’t close the deal. When Saints’ owner Tom Benson lifted the Lombardi Trophy, the hands of every citizen of New Orleans were lifting it right along with him. The triumph was a well­deserved championship for the Saints organization, and for a city and state that have been through so much turmoil and are finally champions.

Football is America's favorite sport again
Baseball may be the national pastime, but for the 26th consecutive year, Americans have voted football their favorite sport. The annual survey, conducted by Harris Poll, saw 35 percent of respondents call professional football their favorite sport. In second place was baseball (16 percent), followed by college football (12 percent). Next up were auto racing (nine percent), men's professional basketball (five percent), professional hockey and men's golf (tied at four percent) and men's college basketball (three percent). Other responses (two percent or less) included soccer, boxing, horse racing, swimming, bowling track and field and tennis. According to Natscape, auto racing is most popular with both older people (aged 50-64) and those with a high-school education or less, and college football is most popular with recent college graduates.

Gainey steps down
The run is over for a former Montreal Canadiens' legend. General manager Bob Gainey stepped down earlier this week after serving as the Habs' GM since 2003. According to TSN, the Canadiens had a record of 241-176-46-7 during Gainey's tenure in the front office. Gainey cited his unwillingness to commit to four or five more years on the job as one of the reasons for his departure. He will stay on in an advisor's role for the time being. Pierre Gauthier will be Gainey's replacement, and will take the job, effective immediately. Gainey spent his entire 16-year NHL career with the Canadiens, serving as captain for eight years and winning five Stanley Cups.

Celebrities to carry torch in Vancouver
With the 2010 Winter Olympics just a couple of weeks away, the Vancouver Olympic Committee is rolling out the big guns to carry the Olympic torch down the home stretch. According to ESPN.com, Patrick's decision is being supported by some and questioned by others. Some in the industry are saying that Patrick isn't used to the restrictor plate racing necessary for success at Daytona. Patrick herself was encouraged by her stock car racing debut on Saturday, when she finished sixth in an ARCA race. Patrick, who has become as well-known for her looks as for her driving, will be racing a car sponsored by GoDaddy.com, the same company she often represents in television commercials.

Dominican Republic wins Caribbean title
The Dominican Republic has been sending talented players to Major League Baseball for decades, but now the island nation has a title to call their own after winning the Leones del Escogido, a Dominican Winter League team, won the Caribbean Series with a 7-4 triumph over Venezuela's Leones del Caracas this past weekend. The Dominican Republic finished the tournament with a record of 5-1, just ahead of Mayaguez, a Puerto Rican team that finished 4-2. The Dominican team featured a plethora of current and former MLB players, including manager Felipe Alou, general manager Moises Alou, current Cincinnati Reds pitcher Jenrry Mejia, current New York Mets Fernando Martinez, among others. The tournament has been held nearly every year since 1949.

No move at all is the best move for struggling Bruins

Bruins' GM must resist urge to attempt a quick fix and stick with his plan

Don Ryan
Journal Staff

Going into the 2009-2010 season, the only question Boston Bruins fans expected to be facing in February was, "just how big is the B's lead in the Northeast Division?" Expectations were high, a Stanley Cup seemed well within reach and nearly every single major player from last year's edition was returning. The last thing Bruins fans thought they'd be worrying about come the Olympic break was fighting for a playoff spot.

But as the calendar ticks towards Feb. 14, the official start of the Olympic break, that's exactly what the Bruins are doing. In fact, if the season ended today, the B's would be on the outside looking in, as they currently sit in the ninth spot in the Eastern Conference, one place out of playoff position. And if this keeps up, what has caused this dramatic fall from grace? A convergence of factors, the main ones being a lot of injuries and a lot of players who aren't matching their point totals from last year.

Patrice Bergeron, Marc Savard, Milan Lucic and Andrew Ference have all missed significant time, with their injuries at times overlapping. In fact, at one point earlier this season the B's were without each of their top-three centers (Bergeron, Savard and David Krejci) all at the same time.

Add in down seasons from players like Tim Thomas, who has yet to regain his Vezina Trophy-winning form of last season, Zdeno Chara, who has been decent but hampered by a finger injury all year, Dennis Wideman, who at times seems to have completely lost his confidence, and Michael Ryder, who hasn't been holding up his end of the goal-scoring bargain.

In fact, pretty much every player, with the exception of Bergeron and Daniel Paille, has been drastically underperforming, creating a perfect storm that led to the B's dropping ten straight games at one point over the past month. Before the Bruins beat Montreal this past Sunday; they had only won two games in 2010: the Winter Classic on Jan. 1 and a shootout win over San Jose on Jan. 14.

This disappointing stretch has led to some serious unrest among Bruins fans. Some are calling on GM Peter Chiarelli to do one or more of the following: fire Claude Julien, trade Michael Ryder, trade for Keith Tkachuk, or trade everyone and start over. As tough as this stretch has been to watch, at this point Chiarelli's best move is no move at all.

Let's not sugar-coat things: the Bruins have been putrid at times this season, lacking effort, losing nearly every puck battle and occasionally looking disinterested in the game.

However, one can't ignore the mountain of injuries this team has had to climb just to get to this point. Other teams have suffered through more injuries (the Detroit Red Wings come to mind), but the B's lost key players for long stretches at key points of the season, and have suffered the consequences.

The team has just started playing with a full roster again in the past couple of weeks, and the results are starting to show. Going into last night's game against the Northeast Division-leading Buffalo Sabres, the Bruins were an unsatisfactory 1-2-3 in the past six games, but had outplayed the opposing team in all but one of those six games.

The team has been peppered opposing goalies with shots, but the bounces haven't been there. They've had some bounces go against them, and when a team is mired in a losing skid the likes of the one the Bruins were experiencing, even the smallest bit of bad luck has a way of snowballing out of control.

At this point, it's extremely unlikely that Chiarelli will make a move before the Olympic break. Truth be told, it'd be best for the team to not make any moves at all, and to either live or die with the current roster. This team as currently assembled is much better than they've been playing, and has yet to reach its full potential.

One thing the Bruins do need is a scorer. However, come Deadline Day, veteran scorers are always few and far between. The team usually comes with a high price tag. Plenty of names have been bandied about, like Tkachuk, Teemu Selanne and Paul Kariya, but each would likely cost the Bruins at least a high-end prospect and a second-round draft pick, a price Chiarelli may be (and should be) unwilling to pay.

Tim Thomas' name has also been mentioned as a trade target on the B's roster, as the emergence of Tuukka Rask has led some to declare Thomas expendable. The Olympian-to-be hasn't been at the top of his game this year, but the team around him hasn't exactly been lights out either. Trading Thomas to a team desperate for goaltending at the deadline may bring the team a nice return, but if the NHL playoffs have proved anything over the last few years it's this: two strong goalies are always better than one.

If the Bruins keep playing like they have been, they are unlikely to even challenge for a playoff spot, let alone seriously challenge for the Stanley Cup, and may find themselves in the unenviable position of just barely sneaking into the playoffs, only to be bounced in the first round. In any other year, this would be a disappointing result, as the team wouldn't be close to winning the Cup and wouldn't get the benefit of a high draft choice.

But this year is different. Due to this past summer's trade of Phil Kessel to the Toronto Maple Leafs, the Bruins own Toronto's first round pick in this summer's draft. The Leafs have been tolling in the league basement since the beginning of the season (they're currently the third-worst team in the NHL), and there is a great chance that the Bruins will be picking in the top-three, at worst in the top-five.

With the Leafs "targeting" them, the B's have no reason to not stick with the plan and try to make a little noise in the playoffs. And here, the word "plan" isn't being used by accident. For the first time in seemingly decades, the Bruins, as an organization, have a plan. Chiarelli is developing his young talent and working with his coach and scouts to find players best suited to play in Claude Julien's defense-first system.

The knowledge that the team would be starting to undo signing players, or to make a big splash to try and right the ship. Before he was traded to the New Jersey Devils, the Bruins were rumored to be a possible landing spot for Ilya Kovalchuk. However, reports suggested that the Bruins wouldn have had to part with Blake Wheeler, David Krejci, an high-end prospect and Toronto's first-round pick to bring the Russian sniper to the Hub.

Chiarelli resisted the urge to make such a huge deal, and in doing so, made the right decision. As the Bruins have learned first-hand this year, no season ever goes perfectly according to plan.

But if Chiarelli and the Bruins stick to his plan for this organization, this team will be stocked with veteran leadership and a wealth of young talent for years to come.

Is this season a lost cause? No, not at all. In fact, it's this opinion in this space that the Bruins will still get into the playoffs and make some serious noise. But if that doesn't happen, and this season ends early for the Bruins, Chiarelli will be able to take solace in the fact that he didn't blow up his plan for an attempt at a quick fix, and that his team will have plenty of high-end talent and a ton of good young prospects for years to come.

Brendan Burke dies at 21

Son of USA hockey General Manager killed in car accident

Matt McQuaid
Journal Staff

Brendan Burke, youngest son of Toronto Maple Leafs' and USA men's Olympic Hockey Team general manager Brian Burke, was killed in a weather-related car accident this past Friday in Indiana. He was 21 years old.

Burke was born in Vancouver, British Columbia, and moved to the Boston area in 1997. He attended Xaverian Brothers High School in Westwood, Mass. After high school, Burke attended Miami University in Oxford, Ohio where he was involved with the school's hockey team as student manager.

Burke came out as a gay man to his father in 2007, the same year Brian Burke won the Stanley Cup with the Anaheim Ducks. Brian Burke was notably accepting and supportive of his son's sexual orientation, attending the Toronto Pride Parade with Brendan in 2009.

"I had a million good reasons to love and admire Brendan," Brian Burke told ESPN. "People in that situation deserve to know that they can feel safe, that sports isn't all homophobic and that there are plenty of people in sports who accept people for who they are."

Burke was also considering a career in politics, and interned for Congressmen William D. Delahunt last summer.

"Brendan was an incredibly talented and gifted person who was smart beyond his years," said Mark Forest, a spokesman for Delahunt, in an article on Boston.com. "Congressman Delahunt once said that Brendan was one of the most special gifts and deep compassion for others that would make him an outstanding public servant."

A Funeral Mass was held for Brendan on Feb. 9 at St. John the Evangelist Church in Westwood, Mass. The O'Jays' song "Forever" was played during the service. The family asks that donations be made to the Brendan Burke Scholarship Fund, The Brian Burke Hockey Academy in Westwood, Mass., and to the Xaverian Brothers.

Prior to his death, Burke was well known for speaking out regarding gay people in the realm of professional sports, and revisited his alma mater to take part in a few occasions to speak to students.

"Imagine if I was in the opposite situation, with a family that wouldn't accept me, working for a sports team where I knew I couldn't come out because I'd be fired or ostracized," Brendan Burke told ESPN. "People in that situation deserve to know that they can feel safe, that sports isn't all homophobic and that there are plenty of people in sports who accept people for who they are."

Rose, Welch net GNAC honors

Don Ryan

Two members of Suffolk's hockey team were honored by the Eastern College Athletic Conference's Northeast division for their performances in the past week. Goalie Jeff Rose, who has had a stellar season thus far, was named the ECAC Northeast's Goalie of the Week for the second time this year, and senior forward Pat Welch, a Dorchester native, was named the Weekly Honor Roll. The Rams went 1-0-1 in the past week, tying Salve Regina, 4-4, before upsetting Curry College in overtime by a score of 3-2. Coming into the game, Curry was ranked 17th in the nation in Division III and hadn't lost in ECAC play on the season. However, Rose came up big, stopping 40 Colonels shots, and Welch potted two goals, including the game-winner with just under a minute gone by in overtime. According to the Suffolk Athletics Department, it was Welch's first game-winning goal of the season. Welch also scored the first goal of the game late in the first period. Suffolk's big win knocked Curry out of the top 25 entirely, dropping the Colonels to the 27th spot and Curry out of the top 25 entirely, dropping the Colonels to the 27th spot and dropping the Colonels to the 27th spot and the team to Niles Moore's 20th

Former coach loses battle with cancer

Bob Norton, interim head softball coach at Suffolk University in the Spring of 2000, passed away on Thursday, Feb. 4 after a long battle with cancer. Coach Norton accepted the one year interim appointment with great enthusiasm as it allowed him to coach his daughter, Kate, in what was to be an All-Star season for her. Kate led the nation in NCAA Division-III batting that spring with a .606 average. Norton also coached his daughter in high school at Fontbonne Academy, where she was a Boston Globe and Boston Herald All-Scholastic selection. Norton was well-known and respected throughout the Massachusetts athletic community. He also coached youth and high school programs in baseball and volleyball. Athletic Director Jim Nelson said of Coach Norton, "Bob Norton, in addition to providing a successful and memorable softball season for all of his players at Suffolk University in the Spring of 2000, also became a good friend and inspirational person in my life, and that of others, as he defied his physician's diagnosis. This spirit gave us all an additional ten years to enjoy his humor, advice and friendship, so readily symbolized at the end of his conversations, as he would say, 'don't be afraid to be good.'" Advice worth emulating. Norton's daughter Kate was inducted into the Suffolk University Athletic Hall of Fame in 2009.

Lady Rams in midst of five-game winning streak

Matt West
Journal Staff

The Suffolk University women's basketball team is in the midst of a pretty impressive stretch, as they've won their last five games and eight of their last ten. After a couple early season losses at the Emerson College Tip-Off Tournament in late November, the Lady Rams have found their stride. 12-8 overall, they are 6-2 in the Great Northeast Athletic Conference. In their Jan. 28 matchup against conference opponent Mount Ida, the win that started the current streak, two of their youngest players led the charge. Freshman guard Jacqueline Vienneau had an impressive 19 points on 5-for-9 shooting, while freshman guard Lindsay Rodgers put up an impressive ten point, eleven rebound performance.

Two days later against another conference opponent in Rivier, the Rams battled hard for a close 58-56 victory. Sophomore Meghan Black played well, scoring 19 points, while hitting the game winner with just over a minute to go in regulation. Their third win came against Newbury College, during which senior forward Laura Thompson had an impressive 16 point, ten rebound game that was abetted by a solid all-around team effort. Black again scored in double digits by netting 14 points, while sophomore guard Mary Garon grabbed ten boards and five points. Their last two wins came against conference opponents Johnson &Whalest and Lasell. Vienneau and Thompson dominated against Johnson & Whalest, with the former scoring 20 points, 12 of which came from three-point land. Thompson had another monster game on the boards, recording her fourth double-double of the year with 14 points and 12 rebounds. Against Lasell, Black added another impressive performance with help from freshman forward Kristina Hayner, who had 14 points.

With four games remaining in the regular season and a firm grasp on third place in the GNAC, the Rams hope to pad their current winning streak and battle for supremacy in a tough conference. With all underclassmen, except senior Thompson, one would expect some intermittent struggles from a team learning how to play not only as a group, but in a competitive college conference. The leap from high school to college ball, no matter the division, can be challenging. Excluding one or two tough losses, the women have played every game extreme-ly tough. It is scary to think how gelled and cohesive they will be in the coming years, but for now they are proving that a predominantly young group can be competitive.

Head coach Ed Leyden has been the head man of the women's program since 1994. Since his first season, they have won an average of 18 games per year. His teams have constantly been models of hard work and consistency. This year's squad is young and athletic, and stands as good a chance as any to finish the season strong and capture a GNAC title. The Lady Rams played a game last night against St. Joseph's (Maine) that ended too late for this edition.
