Y.E.S. keeps kids off streets 13 years

by John Darling

They work — kids, the kind of kids you might find hanging around your neighborhood, those who get in trouble and who keep coming back. They work — and they work hard. They do it for the kids, the kids of Y.E.S., Young and Ended Street, a group of volunteers who work year-round to keep kids off the streets in the city of Philadelphia.

Y.E.S. was started in 1960 by a group of parents who were concerned about the high crime rate in their neighborhood. They decided to take action and formed a group to work with kids and help them stay out of trouble.

The group meets every week to discuss different ways to keep kids off the streets. They work with local schools to set up after-school programs and they hold workshops and seminars to teach kids about the dangers of staying on the streets.

Y.E.S. also works with the police to try to keep kids away from crime. They have a special program called "Safe Streets," which helps kids learn about the dangers of staying on the streets and how to avoid them.
