International economics proposed as new major

by R. Scott Hardy

The College of Business Administration is considering the introduction of a course in international economics as a new major for students. The proposal is being reviewed by the College's Committee on Curriculum Development and will be submitted to the Committee on Academic Standards.

The course would cover topics such as trade, foreign exchange, international trade, and international finance. It would be aimed at upperclassmen and would be offered in the fall semester.

The proposal is being considered as a response to increased interest in international economics among students. The College is currently offering a course in international economics as an elective, and the demand for the course has been strong.

The proposal is also being considered as a way to attract international students to the College. The College has a goal of increasing the number of international students by 20% in the next five years.

If approved, the course would be offered in the fall semester of the academic year 1985-1986.
