Congressional bill may siphon financial aid

by Sandra Miller

In an attempt to slim the U.S. federal deficit, a bill has been passed that would cut off money for federal work-study programs. The measure, which will cost about $900 million if fully funded, would put the nation’s 1.9 million college students at risk of losing their financial aid for next year. The Senate and the House of Representatives have passed different versions of the Gramm-Rudman-Hollings Act, which would put the nation on a path to a balanced budget by 1991. The House bill would impose a $5 billion cut in federal spending, while the Senate’s version would cut $3 billion. A conference committee will meet to work out the details of the bill, but it is likely that some form of the proposed cuts will be included.

Donald Morton

Suffolk Law School’s new director of admissions, Morton, attended our conversation on campus.

The legal community continues to debate the proposed cuts to federal government programs and the impact they will have on students. Morton believes that these cuts will have a significant effect on students, particularly those who rely on work-study programs to support themselves. Morton is concerned about the impact these cuts will have on students who are not able to find other means of support.

The cuts are expected to affect a number of programs, including work-study programs. Morton believes that these cuts will have a significant effect on students, particularly those who rely on work-study programs to support themselves. Morton is concerned about the impact these cuts will have on students who are not able to find other means of support.
